Michal Markowski is a West London-based artist fascinated by mathematics and chaos.

He works with chance as both subject and method. His practice considers how meaning can arise from systems that refuse design: probability, sequence, and the point at which an event becomes an object.

Playing cards form the material basis of the work. A complete deck is shuffled, the process recorded, and the resulting order accepted without correction. The cards are then assembled by hand onto large board, fixing one outcome from the field of '52! Permutations' possible arrangements. In this series, colour is applied to the ground in complementary or contrasting relation to the deck, so that the painted surface and the given sequence operate together rather than one decorating the other.

The work does not seek to master randomness, nor to illustrate it. It holds a single instance of it. What remains is a unique object permanently freezing one unrepeatable moment in time.

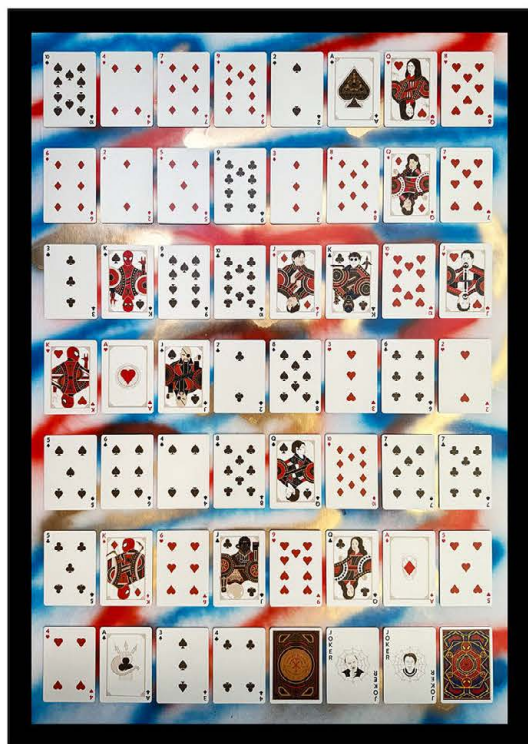

Inimitable by Design. Unrepeatable by Nature.

52! possible permutations — a number greater than the atoms in the observable universe

This brochure features twelve pieces from the larger Inimitable: Fantasy collection that explores pop culture and cinema through official film, comic, and television decks. Each artwork captures a singular, mathematically unrepeatable shuffle, frozen in time.
